Background

In 2013, The History Group Department of Architecture and Planning organized a peer reviewed conference on the theme of “History: Pedagogy and Scholarship”. It was one of the first in the country to cater to the subject of architectural history. Deliberating on its success, a decade later, the endeavor was translated and expanded into the first international Conference on Architecture (CArch) – *History, Theory & Practice, organized in November 2023. In parallel with the Conferences on Urban and Regional Planning organized at DAP-NED, it was thereafter decided to alternate conference themes with one year on Architecture and then on Urban and Regional Planning (CURP).

Theme

The theme of the conference for 2025 is

“Architectural Encounters: Neo-liberalism and Localness- Conflicts and Solutions”

Neoliberalism has emerged as a dominant paradigm, post-industrial revolution. Fundamentally the manifestation of capitalism, it is driven by market forces. The notion of public good in Architecture is often sidelined by neoliberal regimes. Related architectural developments may be representational as iconic, global, debatably usually not addressing a major human demand or need. Localness by contrast, values local culture, geography, notions of place and may be driven by creative aspirations for the purpose. Societal motivation for greater good, representation, supporting participatory democracy and social justice. The two paradigms are a binary in today’s agendas of planning and design. David Harvey defines neoliberalism as an ideological economic project – with a series of leaders, institutions, and key texts –as well as a cultural process whose growth and development has evolved from “state-organized capitalism” that sought to ‘use politics to tame markets, proponents of neoliberalism now use markets to tame politics.

The contemporary architectural developments in cities, include a range of public and private projects. The experience of public facilities and amenities has evolved significantly over the past decades, particularly so in the context of the Global South. Recreational and commercial public facilities characteristically oriented by the Neoliberal market forces, are attractive albeit contributing to increasing social inequalities. The private sector has progressively become a significant role player in public facilitation, creating conflicts in ideology of provision for all, versus for the ‘dignified’. The scope, form and function of public and private projects is under negotiation, with more and more provision for saleable spaces and less and less for provision of social and public services. Quality of public space, quality of life and environment is deteriorating, in the name of economic growth. Regulations oriented to safeguarding right of ways appear open to negotiation and misuse in the process. The city consists of actors that are provided for through planning and architectural interventions and clearly those that are seen to be invisible but unavoidable. In the race to be aligned with global cultures, developing contexts are in the process of losing their architectural and cultural identities represented in built form of housing, heritage, cultural places. The contemporary design of public spaces are less sensitive to the local socio-cultural milieu, and more distinctly aware of image based development, and adopted architectural languages. The congruence of location principles to cities and architectural practices, supporting nature, and culture are contested, vague and miniscule, in contrast to the impact of market forces on the built environment. The disconnect of architecture with the regional context and cultural identity are significant questions for future development in developing contexts. The client service provision makes architectural practice less attuned to ideologies of public and humanistic built environments. Moreover, there is a need to strike a balance between private opportunities and public planning, to address the overwhelming challenges that are currently faced by societies as a result of radical climate change, rapid urbanization and economic instability.

How can a clear understanding of cultural and social requirement help us to think, plan, design and deliver more livable, sustainable and socially responsible architecture? The second
